Hyrum lives in Washington State with his wife and four children and works as an engineer in a semiconductor manufacturer. He grew up in Utah to a very large family and enjoyed wandering the desert with his brothers, looking for lizards and snakes. After several years in college, meandering through dead-end majors, he finally discovered a love of science and changed his major to chemistry.

After graduating from the University of Utah with a B.S. in chemistry, he acquired an advanced degree in chemical engineering at Oregon State University where he fell in love with the Northwest and has stayed ever since. He spends as much time as possible with his kids and enjoys showing them the world, especially the wilderness.
